

What if the world had no borders? Would there be peace or chaos?

A world with borders displays a variety of problems. Nationalistic emotions have although created nations and demonstrated the globe, it has led to immense divide and distrust between two nations. These borders hold authority and continue to stay relevant because of the shared historical struggles and ethnic similarities among its gentry folk. The masses, in turn, are united by title, propaganda of a glorious ancient history, shared language, common culture, as well as the collective struggle for independence.

The various majority of global south countries –

More often than not, such emotions and highly effective uniting factors lead to an extended feeling of connect towards neighbouring nations. In other situations, the nationalistic feelings turn into neighbouring conflicts and create an atmosphere of mutual distrust and hate. Regardless of the situation's nature, with passage of time or perhaps from the moment of independence there are violent clashes between neighbours for their territories or an ideological war to establish ideological supremacy.

Therefore, it is my firm belief that an Earth without boundaries, where exists the concept of 'global citizens' and if nationalism defers to 'globalism,' the world would experience peace.
